

In the northern parts of North America, especially the North Maine Woods and Alaska, moose are common. They like to spend their time near water bodies where they onsite aquatic vegetation. A male bull moose will spend most of their time alone and they can often be seen solo walking along human-made trails. The loon is another animal that is often solitary, producing their eerie call that can be heard from very far away on lake fronts. They are calling to see if other loons are there.
